TREATING RAW RUBBER IN PAPUA.

(1) Liquid rubber and water being emptied into tank through strainers. (2) Gasulating tank, showing solid mass of rubber separated from sap and water by the aid of alkali wash. (3) Pulling rubber into strips in the tank. (4) Rolling rubber to remove water out. (5) Pulling rubber into thin sheets. The second roll makes a diamond-shaped impression. (6) Sheets of rubber on drying rack. (7) Sheet of rolled rubber. It is afterwards "cured" by smoking, and then packed. (8) Boys pressing a damaged rubber shoe after a big game. (9) The rubber mangle.

THE RUBBER INDUSTRY IN PAPUA.

(1) Rubber nursery showing plants about a month old. (2) Rubber plantation of over 7 years old trees ready for tapping. (3) Plantation worker about to make the pencil-ditch cuts to divide a tree into three sections, which are tapped in sequence. (4) Native tapping a rubber tree. (5) A very large rubber tree, showing how the tree is "bird" to obtain the rubber sap, which is collected in a small panikin. (6) Collecting sap from the panikin. (7) Washing panikin. (8) Bringing sap to the factory.—See page 28.
